a one-act play concerning a practical joke

By Richard Chappell

This one-act play was first performed in London, 1899 at the St. James Theatre. It was revived in 1902 where it ran over 100 performances.

Six gentlemen are spending the night at a hotel in a small country town. At the beginning of the play, the men have just heard a story about a supposed ghost inhabiting the hotel. One of the travelers loves theatricals, and when a few of the others are out of the room, he wagers that he can scare someone if he dresses up as the ghost.

The stage directions are quite thorough. You know exactly where each actor is move, sit and stand, and what he is to do. There are two endings to the play, in case "the above tragic termination would be too serious."
